George Bush, the outgoing director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Theodore Sorensen, the incoming CIA chief, appeared on separate television interviews yesterday during the CBS Morning News. Bush said that he hoped that the agency would not become the victim of "proliferated oversight." Sorensen said that there might be times when it would be necessary for the CIA to "undertake a covert operation" but that this would never be done before "the President and responsible people in Congress were aware of it and had approved it."
